

The Power in Your Potential

Are you taking advantage of your untapped potential for greatness? If not, what are you going to do about it? Are you getting everything you can from life? If not, you're not looking hard enough. Life is too short to reflect on "if only." Infuse your thoughts with confidence. Boldly take action to tap your potential.

If you submitted a writing project to a newspaper, magazine, or book publisher, there is a fair chance you got a "rejection slip." Rejection is just one more step to ultimate success. Focus on what you think and stop worrying about what others think. Keep your dream in the forefront of your mind. Many of you may work on a project you don't like because you refuse to acknowledge your potential to develop new knowledge and skills. Let people who think you are fantastic ignite the writing spark within you.

One of the most satisfying benefits of teaching the SOAR process(Six Steps to Overcome Obstacles and Achieve Results)is watching others begin to realize their full potential. Their self-confidence rises to the top. They exhibit a "can do" attitude. When you are stuck on your writing project, seek out those who will give you honest but compassionate feedback. When we share constructive information, we plant the seeds of confidence. Thoughtfully considering the ideas of others can be the key to putting your writing dreams into action.

What is the next level in your writing journey - conduct research, improve writing skills, start a project, finish a project, get your project published? Reward yourself by taking that next step that will move you closer to your desired outcome. Create your vision of success and put in the effort to make it happen.

I encourage you to be self-confident as you write. It is advantageous to believe in your talents and abilities. They help overcome fear and find personal freedom many of us seek. Maintain an optimistic view of life and have faith in yourself. Acknowledge your mistakes and move forward.

You were not born great; you were born with a potential to become great. Acknowledge your potential and reap the benefits.

Don't be fooled. Learn the difference between is real and what is not.
